Augustine vs Pelagius

Key Idea: At the risk of over simplifying Augustine's view of human nature is negative whereas Pelagius has an optimism about human nature. For Pelagius humans are not fallen and damaged by original sin. They are also able to be morally good through their own free will if they so choose.

Augustine (356-430) was by the end of his life one of the most influential and powerful bishops in the church. During this time, he was a key figure in the Pelagian controversy. Pelagianism gets its name from the teachings of Pelagius – although there is debate about whether the views we read are actually the views of Pelagius or his followers. Pelagius (circa 360-418) was a British monk. (or possibly Irish – as one church leader unkindly said that he was 'stuffed with Irish porridge') He spent time in Rome and Jerusalem and was noted for living a simple life. Pelagius preached and wrote against Augustine's ideas of grace fearing that it was causing immoral behaviour. (THINK: Why would this be the case?) As a result of church politics, personalities, and language/communication issues, Pelagianism was condemned at the council of Carthage in 418.

|              | Augustine                            | Pelagius  |
|--------------|--------------------------------------|---|
| Human nature | Human nature is damaged by the       | We can't have a flawed nature. If we did,       |
|              | Fall. It is sinful                   | then God would be commanding the                |
|              |                                      | impossible when he asks humans to be holy.      |
|              |                                      | Sin can only be sin if it is freely chosen      |
| Sin          | Humans are incapable of              | Humans do not have to sin. It is theoretically  |
|              | avoiding sin. The will is now such   | possible for people to be good.                 |
|              | that it has a tendency away from     |   |
|              | goodness                             |   |
| Guilt and    | Adam's sin affects all of us. The    | We are all created in the same state as         |
| Original Sin | Fall transmits guilt to the whole    | Adam. We are only responsible for our own       |
|              | human race. Human beings are         | sin. We become sinners not at birth but         |
|              | sinful at birth                      | when we actually sin.                           |
| Death        | Death is the consequence and         | Death is a biological necessity but not a       |
|              | punishment for sin.                  | punishment                                      |
| Grace        | Humans cannot do any good            | God's grace assists us in doing the right thing |
|              | deeds apart from God's grace.        | and showing us what's right but humans          |
|              |                                      | carry out the actions. Pelagius saw grace as    |
|              |                                      | the natural human faculties, given by God       |
| Salvation    | Salvation is the free and            | For Pelagius humans use their free will to      |
|              | unmerited gift of God. The           | choose God – their actions in choosing bring    |
|              | Parable of the workers (Matthew      | the reward. For Augustine and his followers     |
|              | 20:1-16) shows God rewards how       | this sounds like Pelagius is downplaying the    |
|              | he pleases— the reward is not        | role of grace.                                  |
|              | because of actions -                 |   |
| Suffering    | All suffering is deserved – even     | Augustine makes God sound                       |
|              | infant deaths as all are in original | arbitrary(random) in punishing innocent         |
|              | sin                                  | babies  |